Not illustrated. 1905 Excerpt: . consequence free trade upon the part of all the world, including the United States, with Cuba. This, however, was not the case, as experience has amply demonstrated. Cheaper wages, cheaper operating expenses, lower investments for a given carrying capacity as represented by the cost of hulls and machinery, combined with government assistance, have enabled European shippers to secure lower rates for merchandise from foreign ports than from those of the United States to Cuba. This advantage alone has often been sufficient to offset the same or lower invoice prices for the same merchandises exported to Cuba from the United States. And this alone is sufficient to account for the fact that a considerable part of the carrying export trade of Cuba and a very large part of her carrying import trade is under flags other than that of the United States. It is a well-known fact that, due to the foregoing conditions, among which governmental aid is not the least important, European vessels carry to the coasts of Central and South America and to the islands of the Caribbean Sea cargoes from their home ports at rates with which United States vessels can not compete. From the moment of their discharge their every movement is directed with a view of reaching a port in the United States. Thus they bring cargoes to Cuba at the minimum rate; there they underbid American vessels for carrying Cuban sugar to the United States, and at a port in...
