We passed by Humaion's tomb, and thence through a dreary country full of ruins, along a stony and broken road marked out at equal distances of about a mile and a half, by solid circular stone obelisks, cross-mi-nars, erected during the prosperous times of the empire of Delhi. Halfway to Furreedabad we passed the gigantic ruins of Toghlikabad, on a hill about a cross to our right. I regretted that we could not see them nearer, but the stage was of sufficient length for our horses and the few...
