Sayartia troylxlytts, in these aquaria at any rate, apparently takes three years to reach maturity. In the early part of 1904 the aquaria were somewhat neglected, the water was aerated less frequently and not changed for over three months, and the animals remained unfed for a longer period than usual. Probably as a result of these less favourable conditions only a few young, much fewer than usual, were produced, even by the younger specimens of sajartia: these younger ones were abnormally thin and transparent, and were uot extruded until early in April. The sixteen original specimens produced no offspring whatever in the spring of this year (,19 4. Specimens of Actinia mesembryanthemum living under identical conditions and in the same aquaria as the Sagartia were more fruitful, two in particular being very prolific, though their breeding season...
